

ECHO

Echo is a retreat that blurs boundaries between architecture and landscape.

Defined by a rhythm of wood slats and concrete masses, the residence embraces light, shadow, and materiality to create a sanctuary both monolithic and permeable. Its language draws from the desert's rugged poetics: a concrete base anchors the structure, absorbing shifting hues, while wooden fins wrap upper volumes, filtering sunlight and offering dynamic texture. This interplay of solidity and lightness allows the home to breathe with the land, attuned to diurnal rhythms.

Courtyards and terraces extend living outward, where native plantings soften lines and dissolve edges into desert. Inside, expansive glazing frames mountain silhouettes and sky, erasing barriers between interior and exterior. Echo is architecture of quiet contemplation, where form, material, and nature resonate in synchrony, a retreat that listens to land, light, and desert wind.
